FROM THE PASTOR'S DESK

The Council of Chalcedon (451) formally defined the relation of Jesus's divinity and humanity when it declared that he was one divine person who possessed two complete natures, one of God and one of mankind. (The term "person" refers to who someone is, while the term "nature" indicates a person's capabilities.) These sharpened distinctions were not sudden discoveries of the fifth century but truths implicit in the biblical texts and in the Church's growth in exploring them in the times that followed.

This week we will consider Christ's divine nature as Scripture asserts it. The Jesuit theologian Domenico Grasso's description of miracles is comprehensive and concise. He wrote that they are:

- tangible facts (evident to the senses)
- above natural forces
- caused by God
- having a religious or moral purpose.

The Gospels preserve the memory of more than 30 miracles Jesus worked. Most can be categorized as:

- nature miracles, including the changing of water into wine at Cana (Jn 2, 1-11), the miraculous catch of fish (Lk 5, 1-11) and the calming of the storm on the Sea of Galilee (Mt 8, 23-27 and //s)
- healings, the most numerous category, including the cleansing of the lepers (Lk 17, 12-19) and the cure of the man blind from birth (Jn 9, 1-41)—two of twenty in all
- deliverances from demonic possession and mental illness, for example, the Gerasene demoniacs (Mt 8, 28-34 and //s) and the Epileptic boy (Mt 17, 14-21 and //ss)
- resuscitations of the dead (which differ from Jesus's resurrection, since those others restored to life would eventually die), including the restoration to life of the daughter of Jairus (Lk 8, 41-42 and 49-56 and //s), the son of the widow of Naim (Lk 7, 11-17) and Lazarus (Jn 11, 1-44).

The two greatest theologians in the Church's history after biblical times are St. Augustine (354-430) and St. Thomas Aquinas (c. 1225-1274). Both regarded the miracles of Jesus as key indications of his divinity.

Augustine once said that "I should not be a Christian but for the miracles." Aquinas wrote that

The faith of Christ believed by the saints and handed down to us has been marked by the seal of God shown in works no creature can perform. These are the miracles by which Christ has confirmed holy apostolic doctrine.
